Today's high advances in science, engineering, technology, and manufacturing are automatically putting new social demands on the agenda. Among these social requirements, it is important to improve the system, which is the driving force behind the development of society, as well as the development of industries. The need for training qualified personnel has emerged in the early stages of industrial development, but has not lost its relevance. The main reasons for this are the emergence of new directions, specialties in connection with the social, economic and cultural development of society, the need for training in them, the professional knowledge, skills and abilities of specialists in a changing, fast-paced period. the formation of a need for consistent growth, as well as an increase in the demand for the ability to withstand strong competition in the labor market as a specialist.

In the current situation, the system of continuing education, which has a well-founded mechanism for providing the social, economic and cultural spheres with qualified personnel, in particular, the stages of higher and postgraduate education and training and retraining has a special place. holds. As mentioned above, the rapidly evolving period puts before professionals the task of preparing for drastic changes, self-improvement from a social and professional point of view in line with the period. A well-organized system of advanced training and retraining will play an important
